Snowplows Are a Friendly Hazard

As business owners send their employees out into the cold for business, the Washington State Department of Transportation offers the following warnings to drivers sharing the road with snowplows.

Snowplows are usually spreading anti-icing materials from the back of the truck and may need to stop or take evasive action to avoid stranded vehicles. If you find yourself behind a snowplow, stay well behind it or use caution when passing. The road behind a snowplow will be safer to drive on.

Don't crowd the plow. Snowplows are wide—sometimes very wide. The front plow extends several feet in front of the truck and can cross the centerline and shoulders during plowing operations.

Plows turn and exit the road frequently. Give them plenty of room. Stay back at least 15 car lengths (200 feet).

Watch for snowplows operating in the lanes of oncoming traffic. They can represent a hazard to vehicles in cross-traffic as well, so be alert and give way.

Snowplows can throw up a cloud of snow that can reduce your visibility to zero in less time than you can react. Drive cautiously. Never drive into a snow cloud—it could conceal a snowplow or another road hazard.

A snowplow operator's field of vision is restricted. You may see them, but they may not see you.

Snowplows are a welcome sight when nasty weather affects the roads, but business vehicle accidents are most unwelcome. Encourage your employees to allow themselves enough time to travel safely, and educate them on cautious driving around snowplows.

Personal Articles Floater

Many people know that valuable items like jewelry and art collections are usually insured separately from other property typically covered under a standard home insurance policy. But did you know that separate policies for specific items such as these, often called a personal articles floater, are not just for expensive items?

A personal articles floater is designed to extend better insurance coverage for items that need to be scheduled separately to avoid running into a predetermined sub-limit on a home insurance policy. In addition to jewelry and fine arts, the floater can also cover unique items such as a stamp or coin collection or model railroad. Portable property, such as cameras and video equipment, may be scheduled along with fragile or hard-to-find articles like statuary, sports memorabilia or vintage wine.

In addition to restrictive sub-limits, most home insurance policies limit personal property coverage to a named-peril basis, meaning—if the cause of the loss to property is not specifically listed in the policy—there is no coverage. In contrast, most personal articles floaters are designed to protect your property on an “open-perils” basis, meaning all losses are covered unless specifically excluded.

For example, if you lose a ring in the lake while boating, most home insurance policies will not pay to replace it because there is no peril listed to provide coverage. If the ring were insured on a personal articles floater, the loss would be covered unless the policy specifically describes that event as one that eliminates coverage.

Disability Insurance

According to a recent survey from the non-profit LIFE Foundation, 27% of American workers say they would have trouble supporting themselves financially immediately following a disability that keeps them out of work. Just about half say they would reach that point if disabled a month or less, and 74% say they would reach that point within six months.

The survey also found that, while concern exists, only 17% of workers worry about the financial threat of becoming disabled and being unable to work. This number is much lower than other concerns expressed (“not being able to keep up with bills”—55%, “losing money in investments and savings”—34%, “being laid off”—20%).

“Many working Americans are not as concerned about the risk of a disability as they should be. What they don’t know is that they stand a one-in-three chance of becoming ill or hurt and being out of work at least 90 days at some point in their career,” says Marvin H. Feldman, president and CEO of the LIFE Foundation. “Without disability insurance, most people would face devastating financial consequences if they were to suffer a disabling injury or illness.”

There are many options for disability insurance from policies that cover just the gap in time until Social Security kicks in to coverage for long-term disabilities. Insuring Rental Property

Are you considering converting your residence into an income-producing rental property? Doing so may be a lucrative enterprise, according to Christine Karpinski, author of the book How to Rent Vacation Properties by Owner, who says the average vacation rental brings in about $30,000 a year!

If the lure of additional income has you considering placing your home or condo up for rent, be sure to give our service team a call. A property held for rent, whether full- or part-time, poses unique risk and requires special attention from your insurance company. Many standard home insurance policies will not cover residences that are used to generate rental income. Others may include amendments that significantly reduce or eliminate coverage while the home is rented.

Is owning and managing rental property right for you? When considering the many important factors that answer this question, don’t let “rental property insurance” slip through the cracks! Give our service team a call. We can help you determine the cost of adequately insuring your property as a rental.
